2. What are three distinctive features of classical conservatism?

Feedback: Any three of the following: the traditional social order is preserved; individuals are members of social groups that are linked together by a web of rights and obligations; those born in privileged circumstances have an obligation to those below them on the social ladder; there is a natural social hierarchy based on inherited status; personal dignity depends on one's conformity to the norms and behaviour of one's social group; the rights and responsibilities of those who govern derive from God and tradition; the state's fundamental role is to preserve social order; the state is superior to society and is owed obedience by all citizens and groups; the Crown is the most powerful component of the state; the size and scope of government are small by modern standards, but are not limited by liberalism's suspicion of the state; the state recognizes an official church.

3. What are three distinctive features of classical socialism?

Feedback: Social and economic equality are maximized; private ownership of property is replaced by its collective ownership and management; competition is replaced by co-operation; the welfare of society is maximized through economic and social planning; personal dignity depends on work and one's solidarity with the working class; all just government rests on the consent of the governed and the principles of social and economic equality; the state should control crucial sectors of the economy; government has a responsibility to redistribute wealth from the wealthy to the less fortunate social classes; government is large and its scope wide; a socialist state is the embodiment of the will and interest of the working class; no officially recognized religion.

4. When it comes to their political attitudes and beliefs, are Canadians more like Americans or western Europeans? Use an example to illustrate your answer.

Feedback: A good answer will also discuss the analyses and conclusions of Adams, Resnick, and Boucher.

5. "The United States may once have been the more egalitarian society, but in recent decades Canadians have shown a much greater concern for equality than have their southern neighbours." What does this statement imply?

Feedback: This question is intended to be a broad question that enables students to reflect on much of what is covered throughout Chapter 2.

6. What is false consciousness?

Feedback: A Marxist concept describing the inability of subordinate social classes to see where their real interests lie and their acceptance of cultural values and beliefs that justify their exploitation by the dominant class. This concept attempts to answer the question of why subordinate classes adopt beliefs that only benefit the dominant class.

7. What is one example of a major violent confrontation between Indigenous and non-Indigenous people or political authorities?

Feedback: Several options could be part of the student's response to this question. They could use the 2006 arrests of Six Nations protestors at Caledonia; the 2004 anti-police riot at Kanesatake in Quebec; or the 1990 Oka confrontation during which Indigenous protestors attempted to protect land that was under threat of development.

8. What is libertarianism?

Feedback: Libertarianism is the view that individuals should be allowed the largest possible margin of freedom in all realms of life, including those that involve moral choices. As a result, although libertarians generally agree with right-wing policies and are ideologically conservative, they are also likely to advance pro-abortion, pro-same sex marriage, and pro-assisted suicide views.

9. What is multiculturalism?

Feedback: A value system based on the premise that ethnic and cultural identities and traditions are important to human happiness and dignity and that public policy ought to recognize, support, and promote the retention of these identities and traditions. In Canada an official policy of multiculturalism has existed since 1971. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms acknowledges the "multicultural heritage of Canadians" and the Multiculturalism Act, 1988 commits the Canadian government to a policy of promoting multiculturalism. This is done largely through the Department of Canadian Heritage.

10. What does the motto "je me souviens" ("I remember"), found on Quebec license plates, refer to?

Feedback: It refers to a time before the British Conquest of New France in 1759. Presumably, at that time French-speaking Canadians were free from the oppression of Ottawa and English Canadians. Particularly under Parti Québécois governments in Quebec it has been common for the Conquest to be mentioned in official government documents on subjects ranging from language to the economy and constitutional reform.

11. What is the "centre"?

Feedback: The centre is, virtually by definition, the mainstream of a society's politics, and those who occupy this location on the political spectrum are likely to view themselves as being non-ideological and pragmatic.

12. What did Seymour Lipset mean in discussing English Canada's counter-revolutionary origins?

Feedback: Lipset wrote, "Americans do not know but Canadians cannot forget that two nations, not one, came out of the American Revolution. The United States is the country of the revolution, Canada of the counterrevolution. These very different formative events set indelible marks on the two nations. One celebrates the overthrow of an oppressive state, the triumph of the people, a successful effort to create a type of government never seen before. The other commemorates a defeat and a long struggle to preserve a historical source of legitimacy: government's deriving its title-to-rule from a monarchy linked to church establishment. Government power is feared in the south; uninhibited popular sovereignty has been a concern in the north."

13. What are path dependency models?

Feedback: This explanatory framework emphasizes the impact that key historical events and conditions have on the trajectory that will be followed by a society, a value system, or an economy. James Mahoney explains it this way: [P]ath dependence characterizes specifically those historical sequences in which contingent events set into motion institutional patterns or event chains that have deterministic properties. The identification of path dependence therefore involves both tracing a given outcome back to a particular set of historical events, and showing how these events are themselves contingent occurrences that cannot be explained on the basis of prior historical conditions.

14. Give some examples of Canadian governments discriminating against ethnic and religious communities.

Feedback: In fact, however, Canadian governments have shown themselves to be as capable as their American counterparts of discriminating against ethnic and religious communities. Canada banned Chinese immigration more than two decades following passage of the Chinese Immigration Act of 1923. In Canada, many people of Japanese ancestry were deprived of their property and kept confined to camps during World War II. In Canada, the religious beliefs of Doukhobors, Hutterites, Mennonites, and Jehovah's Witnesses have at various times brought them into conflict with either Ottawa or provincial governments. In Canada, immigration policy until the 1960s discriminated against non-white, non-European peoples—although this is no longer characteristic of policy in either country.

15. What did George Grant argue in Lament for a Nation?

Feedback: In Lament for a Nation, Grant argued that the Canadian political tradition was marked by a communitarian spirit that rejected the individualism of American-style liberalism. He traced the roots of this spirit to the influence of conservative ideas and the British connection, which helped to keep alive a benign view of government as an agent for pursuing the common good. This distinctive national character was, Grant believed, doomed to be crushed by the steamroller of American liberalism and technology, homogenizing influences that would ultimately flatten national cultures throughout the capitalist world. Grant's "lament" was in the key of what has been called Red Toryism.

Title: Chapter 02 Question 01

1. "Canada is more democratic than the United States." Based on the analysis of the political attitudes and beliefs of Canadians and Americans, discuss this claim, explaining why you think it is mainly true or mainly false.

Feedback: A complete answer will: identify the criteria for comparison: freedom, equality, etc.; and draw on statistical and other empirical evidence. It will also respond to the following questions: What is the Canadian perception on this matter? Has there been change over time in the democratic qualities of each country?

2. What would you say are the chief elements of Canada's political culture? Explain why you think the Canadian and American political cultures are mainly similar or mainly different.

Feedback: The four headings used in this chapter—community, freedom, equality, and citizen expectations for government—would be a good starting point. The answer might also discuss the roots of Canadian political culture, including the fragment theory, formative events, and economic explanations for the political ideas of Canadians.

3. Do such ideological labels as "right," "left," "conservative," "liberal," and "socialist" help us to understand Canadian politics and the conflicts that matter in our society? Are any of these concepts outmoded and no longer relevant? Are there new labels that do a better job in helping us understand political conflict?

Feedback: A complete answer will identify the main characteristics of each ideology. Are these labels still relevant? Illustrate with reference to issues, conflicts, parties, etc. Are other labels and the world views associated with them more relevant to understanding contemporary politics?

4. The fragment theory, formative events theory, and economic explanations for the historical development of political ideas in Canada focus on different causes. Summarize each approach and explain what you see as the strengths and weaknesses of each.

Feedback: The fragment theory is likely to be seen as the least relevant, given that it emphasizes the importance of people and ideas from the very early history of Canada. This does not mean that it is in fact of no use in understanding contemporary Canadian political culture. A good answer will recognize the possibility of transmission belts that convey the ideas of previous generations to the present. Beyond comparison, a strong answer will provide reasons why the insights generated by one or another of these explanations are superior and more relevant than the others, perhaps drawing on contemporary events, political figures, or conflicts.

5. The idea of Canada as a single political community has been challenged at various times and by certain groups. Why? Does the fact that Canada has one of the oldest democratic constitutions in the world and one of the highest standards of living indicate that these challenges have not been very serious?

Feedback: This idea has been challenged in several ways: challenges from Quebec nationalists objecting to Canada's British ties and symbols and perceived Anglophone domination; challenge of Quebec separatists and the notion that Canada is an unnatural country based on what historically has been an unequal relationship between its French- and English-speaking communities; and challenge from Native Canadians, some of whom reject the authority of the Canadian state in some circumstances and who support civil disobedience. But these challenges need to be weighed against the successes of national unity and accommodation.

6. Why can ideology "spill beyond the boundaries of politics to embrace beliefs and judgments about other social relationships, including economic ones"?

Feedback: This holistic character of ideologies distinguishes them from more limited political value systems. Although most people are not aware of having ideological leanings, and might be puzzled or even startled at being labelled conservative, liberal, or socialist, this does not mean that ideology is irrelevant to their political beliefs and actions. Instead, it may simply indicate that a particular ideological mindset is so pervasive and dominant—it has become, in other words, the conventional wisdom—that its unexamined premises seem inevitable and obvious.

Title: Chapter 02 Question 07

7. Why would someone argue that ideology is over?

Feedback: This is the "end of ideology" thesis that American sociologist Daniel Bell put forward in the 1960s. "In the western world," he argued, "there is today, a rough consensus among intellectuals on political issues: the acceptance of a Welfare State; the desirability of decentralized power; a system of mixed economy and of political pluralism." Since then, some commentators have dismissed the traditional "isms" and the left-centre-right ideological grid as outmoded ways of thinking about politics.

Those who would argue that familiar ideological categories and the individualism/collectivism dichotomy have become obsolete and that politics has become largely a debate about means rather than ends underestimate the continuing vitality of the struggle between what we might call competing images of the moral order. Many of the most profoundly felt differences of opinion on issues of importance in contemporary public life, from ideas and policies relating to the family to issues of trade and taxation, are based on the different ideas that people have about what social, economic, and political arrangements are consistent with personal dignity, justice, social order, economic efficiency and the good society. By and large, those on the right of the modern ideological divide are less likely than those on the left to look to state action for the advancement and protection of the moral order that they prefer. This may be seen in the ongoing debate over the consequences of globalization—a debate in which moral considerations are seldom far from the surface.

8. Why does Canada's political community seem fragile at times?

Feedback: Canada's sense of community has sometimes seemed terribly fragile, threatened by French-English tensions, western grievances against Ontario and Quebec, and, most recently, conflicts between the aspirations of indigenous Canadians and the policies of federal and provincial governments. This apparent fragility needs to be viewed alongside evidence suggesting that the country has been relatively successful in managing (repressing, critics would say) challenges to the idea and continuation of a united Canada. The existing Constitution dates from 1867, making it one of the oldest and most durable in the world. Moreover, the territorial integrity of the country has remained unshaken by either civil war or secession. This is not to understate the importance of the rifts in Canada's sense of community. But the problems of Canadian unity and identity should be viewed from a broader perspective and the unity challenges that other societies have faced.

9. Discuss the variance in levels of popular support for Quebec independence.

Feedback: According to public opinion polls, the level of popular support for Quebec independence has ranged between a low of about 20 per cent just after the birth of the PQ to a high of nearly 60 per cent (see Figure 2.1). In recent years it has hovered around one-third of Quebecers, including just over 4 in 10 of those whose mother tongue is French. Without reading too much into the numbers, we may say that there appears to be a durable core of support for the idea of Quebec independence, but that it may lack the potential for growth (see the discussion in Chapter 14). Not only has the level of support varied over time, it is also influenced by what sort of independence is envisaged by the pollster's question. Support always has been higher for softer options such as "sovereignty-association"—a term generally understood to mean a politically sovereign Quebec that would be linked to Canada through some sort of commercial union or free trade agreement—than for outright political and economic separation.

10. Was English Canada founded on an ethos of limited government?

Feedback: English Canada was not founded on an ethos of limited government. Nor did the country experience self-government and then independence until long after the American Revolution that Loyalists rejected. Instead of celebrating what Abraham Lincoln, in the Gettysburg Address (1863), describes as "a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal," most of Canada's leaders celebrated the connection to Great Britain and the conservative idea that "freedom wears a crown" until well into the twentieth century. As Lipset observes, "If [Canada] leans towards communitarianism—the public mobilization of resources to fulfill group objectives—the [United States] sees individualism—private endeavour—as the way an 'unseen hand' produces optimum, socially beneficial results." Canadian writer Pierre Berton made the same point when he maintained that "We've always accepted more governmental control over our lives than . . . [Americans] have—and fewer civil liberties."
