- 119) Information for each account is stored in the ledger. The ledger becomes an accounting history for each account, since it details all of the transactions for each account. It also contains the dates of the transactions and references to the journal from which the transactions have been posted.

- 120) The journal is used to keep a chronological record of the organizations transactions. The journalizing process involves first determining each account affected by the transaction including its type. Next determine if each account is increased or decreased then apply the rules of debit or credits to each account. The last step is using this information to record the transaction in the journal ensuring all debits and credits balance. A description of the transaction is also included in the journal entry.

- 166) Using a T-account format, the normal balance of any account is the side that increases the balance in the account. For asset accounts the normal balance would be the debit side of the T-account. Asset accounts are often referred to as "debit-balance accounts." Crediting a liability account increases its balance, so it has a normal balance of a credit. Liability accounts are called "credit-balance accounts."
 - The reason why assets are debit-balance accounts and liabilities are credit-balance accounts is caused by the accounting equation. "Assets equal liabilities plus shareholders' equity" means that asset and liability accounts must have opposite normal balances for the equation to balance.
- 167) Using a T-account format, the normal balance of any account is the side that increases the balance in the account. For the Retained Earnings account, its normal balance would be the credit side of the T-account. The Retained Earnings account is referred to as a "credit-balance account." Debiting an expense account increases its balance, so it has a normal balance of a debit. Expense accounts are called "debit-balance accounts."

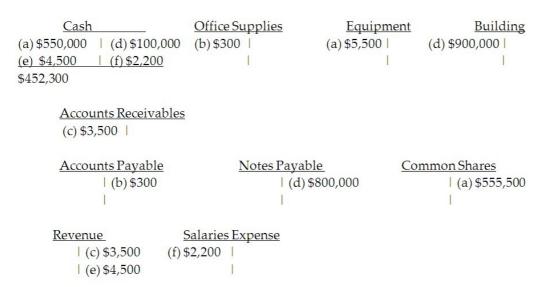

The reason why the Retained Earnings account is a credit-balance account and expense accounts are debit-balance accounts is caused by the accounting equation. "Assets equal liabilities plus shareholders' equity" means that the Retained Earnings account must have a credit balance in order for the equation to balance.

Expense accounts are deducted from revenue accounts to obtain net income (or net loss). Revenue accounts carry a normal credit balance, and therefore expense accounts must carry a normal debit balance for us to obtain net income or loss. Net income increases the Retained Earnings credit balance account. A net loss for the period would decrease the Retained Earnings account.

168) The trial balance lists all the company's accounts (i.e., assets, liabilities, owners' equity, revenues, and expenses) and their balances as of a specific date. This information is obtained from the ledger.
