If someone is considered a resident of the United States, then they are granted all the rights and privileges associated with citizenship. However, racial classification has had an important impact on whether or not someone was granted citizenship. Historically speaking, identify who decided which racial groups could become citizens and which individuals belonged to particular racial groups.	If someone is considered a resident of the United States, then they are granted all the rights and privileges associated with citizenship. However, racial classification has had an important impact on whether or not someone was granted citizenship. Historically speaking, identify who decided which racial groups could become citizens and which individuals belonged to particular racial groups.

classification varies from nation to nation because these categories are socially, culturally, politically, and historically construed. While this may lead some to conclude there is no need to continue collecting information about these categories, ignoring racial categories in data collection would dismiss the historical racial legacies and their institutional consequences. For instance, higher education enrollment is influenced by social class, which is influenced by race in social hierarchies. The refusal to recognize race only exacerbates racial inequalities by rendering antiracist programs impossible.

Answers may vary, but should provide an example that demonstrates how whiteness is unspoken and unnamed. Whiteness is normalized and all other groups are measured against this dominant category. By not having its language, clothing, food, and all other everyday normative activities or choices questioned, results in a form of cultural and social privilege for those belonging to or enacting it in their everyday lives.
