78. Why are supervisors wise to avoid relying on managerial authority to motivate employees?

ANSWER: Approaches that foster mutual trust and respect between a supervisor and his/her subordinates generally result in increased job satisfaction and, consequently, higher productivity. Employees are likely to perform better if they understand why a task needs to be done rather than simply being told to do it. Supervisors who display their power and formal authority are likely to produce unhappy, unproductive workers.

80. Is leadership the same thing as management? Why or why not?

ANSWER: Leadership is not synonymous with management. Leadership is vision as to what must be accomplished, and the strategies that are involved in reaching that vision. Leadership also entails assembling the relevant people who will support those strategies. Management involves doing the right things and keeping the current system operating through planning, budgeting, staffing, controlling, and problem-solving. In an ideal setting, individuals would have a blend of both good management and leadership skills. Management without leadership buries organizations in a great deal of bureaucracy. Leadership without management runs the risk of chaos and disorder in organizations.
